" successful relief of the sufferers from bail-" storm and flood in 1880-1 proved the ad " vnntages of the system, and made all will "ing to contribute. In future, when the "stores become abundant, the collection may "be temporarily stopped." The foregoing statement, as we have remarked, indicates that the provincial mandarinate are not insensible to the importance of making provision against a repetition of the awful suffering and chocking mortality which attended the great famine. But the well-meaning Fixe, like most of his fellow officials, seems to quite overlook the desirability of securing a guarantee against famine by means of improved means of communication. Shensi is one of the most inland provinces of China, is hundreds of miles, even as the crow flies, from the coast, and has no good river communication, the Hoang-ho only touching its frontier, and owing to its impetuous nature not forming

so good a highway as the other great rivers of the Central Kingdom, while inflicting great periodical damage to the crops by its overflow. It is all very well to store part of one year's crops for use in the event of the next year's failing, as the Governor of Shenhi is doing, but how would the people fare in the event of two or three successive badyears? It is to be feared that the store would soon fail, and famine supervene. Yet there would be no great fear of such a calamity were there only a proper means of communication established with the coast. either by means of a railway or a good road.

With the abundance of cheap labour available in China the latter work-would not be difficult; but we think that a main railway from the coast right through to Kausuh, fed by some good roads, would be the most advantageous system to adopt. Had such a railway existed in 1878, the grain providmight have been placed within their reach NORTHERN & Messrs. Hall & Holtz and Kelly in time to save them from starvation There is only too much reason to fear that in the event of another famine occurring in the western provinces a similar appalling loss of life-would-result not be cause of any want of supplies, but from the mpossibility of conveying them to

CHIPS FROM MANY BLOCKS

We have frequently had occasion to notice the imilarity which exists between the superstitious of the Chinese and other Eastern peoples. Mr. Boulger tells us that among the Turcomans and in Persia, there is a strong prejudice against recompying the site of a rained city. It is so in China, and everyone who has visited Canton will remember what a large portion of the city still remains in rains and anocompied, no one being found sufficiently bold and courageous to utilize the old walls and foundations left after the war with England and France. The same | able rise. is true of Morv. See Academy, November 11th,

In an old play, by Ch. Western Antiquary, Oct. 1882, p. 112.

As a further illustration of this subject it isnow well known that the barber was originally surgeon as well, the name surgeon having reference to skill in the use of the hands (chi rurgeon); a qualification which could not be lispensed with in China, where the barber i often employed to sbampoo or knead his patient's body with his hands, for the relief of rheumatism and other similar complaints. A friend of mine (Rov. W. Burgess, of India) recently wrote an account of a journey he took through pulsed by the storm within him that the jeers of the Nizam's territory, in which he states that he found the native barbers there also filling office as doctors, the two professions being combined as they formerly were in England and still are of Deputies when Cambetta delivered one of his Shipowners-or-commanders should be recomided save the Nautical Magazine, to navigate and several collisions have happened lately owing to their navigating upon one line. A double line in the Channels is, perhaps, not as neces sary as upon railways; but it would be very much safor than a single line, or upon any promisecous one. It is also practicable. A well-navigated steamer, whose compasses have proper attention, will make a wonderfully correct course in either of the channels. There are also few lights about our coasts which cannot be seen at a distance of fifteen miles, under reasonably fair weather. It is therefore, proposed that homeward-bound yessols—steamers—should navigate in a line about eight miles from beadlands and outward bounders about five miles, thus preserving a good and safe distance of about three miles between them.

GAMBETTA AS AN ORATOR

A Paris correspondent writes :- "The chief ecret of Gambetta's power as an orator was that he allowed his emotions to carry him along with them, as seemingly belploss as a loaf in the tempest. He employed none of those tricks of oratory, none of those studied gestures, which I are the stage carpentry of the Tribune, the sheetanchor of mediccrity. Gambetta's characteristic eloquence was the language of passion: it was not until his whole being was shaken and conenemies were silenced, and who detested his principles grew pale with excitement and surrendered themselves for the time being to the magic of his influence. I was in the Chamber last great speeches. He walked up the steps of the tribune listlessly; his face was unusually voice that every head was bent forward in order to batch his words. There was no might yewing of the axeagainst the tree he wished to fell, but a dilatory chipping of the bark that was positively irritatat once to his task. Presently some murmurs prose in the House, some scoffing from the Rered has of his face changed to pale clive, his fingers clutched the rostrum pervously, and his We have just received the Descriptive Ca- voice at each successive period rose to a higher allusion. Then he boren to pace the tribune dame of sound as to drown the risin; tumult From that moment, and for fully an hour afterwards, the Chamber was spell-bound."

MR. EDISON AND THE ELECTRIC

An American correspondent to the Times gives the following account of the progress of Mr. Edison's inventions in connection with the electric The development of Edison's system of electric lighting, of which so much was heard in l London during the early part of 1882, has since thon almost exclusively engaged the attention of the inventor. It is well known that the Edison system comprises the manufacture, distribution, and measurement of electricity by means of a meter, and the sale of light and power ng note or two on Ancient Egyptian Flower-lore to consumers on their own premises. In New York, the central station in Pearl-street was opened on the 5th of September last, since which ate there has been no intermission in the production of the current, either day or night. The pressure on the twenty miles of mains is constant and equal, and the additions to the system average something like eighty lamps per day. The remarkable simplicity of administration cannot fail to impress even the ignorant visitor. The regulation of the system is carried on y means of an automatic device, by which when the lamps on the system are below their proper candle power a green lamp is switched into cirouit, and when the candle-power is excessive the fact is indicated by the display of a red lamp. The lamps are perfectly steady, and are maintained at a somewhat greater candle-power than the majority of incandescent lamps in England. The success of this practical trial of the system is now beyond question. Not only are the in habitants of the district daily demanding the supply of the new light, but stations up town in New York, as also in Boston, Chicago, and Denver, are already in contemplation. The Edison Lamp Company, whose factory is at Newark, in New Jersey, possesses an establish ment which is remarkable even in the land of in genious processes. The Edison lamp passes

> Machine Works, at Goerk streat, New York, the lynamos, large and small, are manufactured Six dynamos of the largest size were awaiting shipment to London; four were being prepared for Milan, where a contral station on the Edison system is being organized by professor Colombo. The factory of Bergmann and Co. is exclusively devoted to the manufacture of switches, littings, sockets, regulators, and other details of the com plete Edison electric light system. Here also the application of electricity as a motive power and lighting agent was manifested in an impressive manner. Mr. Edward H. Johnson, whose name is well known in London, together with Mr. Edison-is continually at work improving the minution of the system. Some months have elapsed since the Edison system was first shown to the English public at the Crystal Palace, and, as is well known, it is in operation at various places. Since then Mr. Edison has, however. not been idle. He has made remarkable dis. I ermaneter attach noverion the effect of which is greatly to increase the efficiency and reduce the cost of
